Abstract: The development of urbanisation contributes to the development of tertiary industries and population development. Product marketing, land resource marketing and labour marketing play an important role in promoting urban development. The rapid development of urbanisation has caused considerable damage to the aquaeological environment, which has created major obstacles to the healthy and sustainable development of cities. This paper explains the current state of urban water ecology, analyses existing problems of water ecology in the process of urbanisation and advocates rational management measures. As urbanisation has progressed, the population of cities has increased, leading to a high level of water pollution and a lack of water resources, leading to a sharp deterioration of the aquatic environment and a sharp decline in use. Therefore, on the basis of the problems encountered in water ecology management in the current urbanisation process, it is necessary to apply the oxygen treatment technology to the water environment in order to sensitise people to the aquatic ecological environment, to repair damaged aquatic ecology, develop underwater ecosystems and improve the water quality of urban environments. We use and protect the city's aquatic resources. [ABSTRACT FROM AUTHOR]
